

Beijing Capital International Airport Ground Transportation Guide

Beijing Capital International Airport (IATA: PEK, ICAO: ZBAA) is located in the northeast suburb of Beijing, China. It is 25 kilometers away from the center of Beijing and 67 kilometers away from Beijing Daxing International Airport. It is one of China's three portal composite hubs, a member of the international air cargo hub group. Beijing Capital International Airport was built in 1958. T1 terminal, parking lot and other supporting projects were completed and officially put into use in 1980. In 1999, Terminal 2 was officially put into use, and Terminal 1 was stopped for new decoration. In 2004, the T1 was put into use again. In the spring of 2008, the new airport project - T3 was completed. The three terminals cover an area of 1.41 million square meters in total. From 1978 to 2018, the annual passenger throughput of Beijing Capital International Airport has increased from 1.03 million to 11 million, ranking to the first place in Asia and second in the world.

Banking services

Banking services provide passengers with deposit and credit card services in RMB and some foreign currencies, to handle domestic bills, cheques, exchange and international exchange, foreign currency exchange, sale and exchange of traveler's cheques on a commission basis. ATM machines and automatic money changers are set up at many places in the terminal.

No border inspection

From 0:00 on April 15, 2015, passengers who take international or regional flights to transit from Beijing Capital International Airport to international or regional destinations, to stay at the airport for no more than 24 hours, and do not leave the limited area of the airport port in the middle of the journey can be exempted from border inspection procedures. There is no nationality restriction on the scope of passengers, foreigners, Chinese mainland residents, Hong Kong, Macao and Taiwan residents. The scope of flight routes include the transit routes to third countries, regions or countries of origin.

Visa free

Since January 1, 2013, Beijing Capital International Airport has implemented a 72-hour transit visa free policy for some foreigners holding third country visas. If the nationality of a passenger is within the scope of the visa free countries list, if the passenger wants to stay for a short time in Beijing when transferring flights, and his/her stay time does not exceed 72 hours, he/she only applies for handling the 72-hour transit visa free formalities at the border inspection office of Beijing Capital International Airport. The 72-hour-visa-free-transit policy is only applicable to foreigners who enter from Beijing and leave Beijing after a short stay.
