

Is it true that people have rented nearby the imperial kiln and dug tunnels at night to search for ancient ceramics during 1990?

Indeed, the Imperial Kiln Factory had many precious historical ceramics buried underground. Over the past few decades, there have been individuals engaging in underground excavations to search for and unearth these ancient ceramics, leading to some interesting stories.

According to legends, some porcelain enthusiasts and archaeology enthusiasts would sneak into the underground of the Imperial Kiln Factory at night and dig tunnels using various methods, hoping to find valuable ceramics buried underground. They believed that the underground of the Imperial Kiln Factory might hold forgotten treasures of ceramics.

These adventurers would often take risks of being arrested or encountering accidents as they explored the underground during the dark night. Carefully using tools like shovels and hoes, they would excavate the soil, hoping to discover fragments or intact pieces of ceramics hidden beneath the ground. Sometimes, they even used metal detectors to search for buried targets underground.

These activities of searching for ancient ceramics garnered widespread attention and controversy. Some viewed it as destruction and theft of historical sites, compromising the integrity of cultural heritage. Others considered it as exploration and protection of historical culture, hoping to find precious ceramics and display them to a wider audience.

Regardless of one's stance, these stories of digging underground and searching for ancient ceramics added mystery and excitement to the Imperial Kiln Factory. They remind people of the rich historical and cultural value contained within the Imperial Kiln Factory and ignite a passion for the love and exploration of ceramics.
